[Relationship between TLR2 gene polymorphisms and multiple myeloma]. The aim of this study was to investigate the relationship between multiple myeloma (MM) and single nucleotide polymorphisms (SNPs) in the gene encoding for Toll-like receptor 2 (TLR2) in patients with MM. The genotypes of SNPs in the coding sequence and promoter of the TLR2 gene in 209 patients with MM and 302 healthy controls were analyzed by PCR-based restriction fragment length polymorphism. The genotype frequencies of -169 T > G in the promoter of the TLR2 gene was significantly different between MM patients and healthy controls ($P = 0.023$). There were significantly more homozygous G alleles in patients with MM (37.8%, 55/143) compared with healthy controls (22.4%, 47/210), and the heterozygous (T/G) allele was significantly less frequent in patients (43.9%, 63/143) compared with the controls (57.1%, 128/210). The OR of -169 G allele for multiple myeloma was 0.67 (95% CI: 0.46 - 0.99, $P = 0.044$). This results indicated that -169 G allele of the TLR2 gene could be a potential candidate for the susceptibility to MM.

Illusory contours in the human visual system? Illusory contours are perceived in various visual systems, such as in the human visual system. In this study we will review studies that have looked at the neuronal activity in the human visual system that might be related to the perception of illusory contours. In these studies it has been shown that neurons in the human visual cortex have responses to contours consisting of collinear or non-collinear pixels. Collinear and non-collinear contours result in differential responses in the visual cortex. It has been shown that the representation of the collinear contour is more robust in the brain than that of the non-collinear contour and that the perception of illusory contours is accompanied by increased activity of neuronal population. On the basis of these findings, we suggest that the visual system may be predisposed to perceive illusory contours.
