When deployed, these trailers are typically set on skids. While this requires only the removal of four tires and the installation of four scuffers, it permits the use of a much wider variety of tires than a truck without skids. There are many different types of tires which are used to towed trailers. A significant distinction is a tire having a special built up tread which is suitable for use on conventional trucks and a tire which is suitable for towing use. Thus, while the wheels of the truck may be welded to the axles, the wheels of the trailer are often secured to their corresponding skids. This is usually done by welding the parts together with the ends of the axles formed as splines or otherwise joined together by splines. While most towed trailers use scuffed up trailer tires, trailers for military applications require special tires which are self-supporting and often run on a narrow, hard surfaced path. Usually, they have a special built up tread with large valves. It is believed that such tires are known as Interim Trailers, Tank Trailers or Military PLCs. Typically, these tires are used on the rear wheels of the trailer, as that is the wheel which bears directly on the path surface. The attitude of the vehicle upon which the trailer is towed, and the particular tires used on the trailer, are critical factors in determining how well the trailer will negotiate the path upon which it runs. For example, the wheels of the trailer which bear on the path must be able to roll smoothly and freely as they move over the surface, and tire contact with the surface should be made uniformly over the entire width of the trailer wheel. Also, even though the trailer is towed by a truck
